PEL 125 - STAR COURSE IMPLEMENTATION STRATEGIES

1. Who is the Best Presenter?

In this activity, students will present the products/project/software/tools of the chosen company. Students will use appropriate adjectives to describe the product. They will be able to use appropriate tenses while describing the function/usage of the same.

2. Communicative Alice

In this activity, students will be shown an animation based on engineering field. They will be asked to narrate a story based on the ideas shown.

3. Complete the description

In this activity, first few lines about any product/program/software/website will be given to the students. They will be asked to complete the description using appropriate sentence structure using appropriate terms/adjectives

4. Ignite Conversation

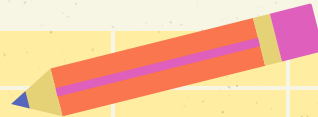

In this activity, students will be given technical topics to the teams and students will speak for and against the topic.

5. I, Me, Myself

This activity is about looking back at the person you were and the information you had when you attended any interview as compared to now. As with writing letters to your future self, five years is often used as the point in the past to look back to – it provides sufficient distance for change to have happened but close enough to be tangible and within your memory. This letter will focus on what you advice you would give your past self and tell them about what has happened between then and now so that errors in past can be avoided in future interviews.

6. Picker Wheel

This activity uses a basic form of questioning. The main principle of using items for self-awareness is choosing an item to represent you or something about you. The 'items' you use can include physical objects, characters and other things – the main point is that the 'thing' needs some defining characteristics. Questions tend to follow a pattern like 'What [prescribed type or source of item] represents [area you want to explore]?'

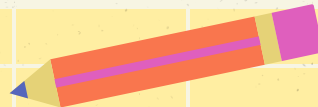

7. Stack Pack

Students write the topic sentence in the middle box. They write a sentence containing a supporting detail in three of the squares and they write a concluding sentence in the last square.

8. Bingo

Using pre-prepared bingo cards or sheets (example provided), ask the members of a group to choose a participant to match the descriptions of the persons admired in the most in world of technology in the relevant square on the bingo card. As with the normal game of bingo, participants should shout 'BINGO!' if they successfully gather a full row of signatures, whether vertically, horizontally or diagonally.

Each square contains facts/characteristics that may relate to one or more people. Your task is to mingle with your fellow participants and ask questions in order to match an individual to the information in one of the bingo squares. If you find a match, ask the participant to sign the relevant box. You can only match one participant to one bingo square, even if more than one fact/characteristic applies to them. As soon as you get a line of signatures (vertically, horizontally or diagonally), alert the rest of the group by shouting 'BINGO!'

9. Fault Line

Have students draw a diagonal line across an index card. On the top half, have them write the vocabulary word and definition. On the bottom half, have them draw a picture of the word and use it in a sentence.

Cards can be joined together in a strip for easy review.

10. Word Pop

Write vocabulary words on cards or craft sticks and place in a paper bag. Write the word Pop! on three to five cards or sticks and add them to the bag as well. To play, students will take turns drawing cards or sticks out of the bag, reading the word and giving the definition. If they correctly define the word, they keep the card or stick. If not, it goes back in the bag. If they pull the word Pop! they must return all their cards or sticks to the bag and start over. The player with the most cards or sticks wins.
